At 3:13 GMT, last Saturday, I activated my consumer-grade HFM Device, tuned into the designated frequency, and began exploring the inner sanctuary, the authentic realm of the Plasmoids. This experience will be chronicled in a five-part series of illustrated booklets, published in collaboration with the wonderful team at the Lone Palm Ferry Casino's Gift Shop Emporium and the WWWG Plantation and Print Shop Corporation. These booklets will showcase my observations of the Plasma World. However, dear readers, keep in mind that, like any diligent remote viewer, I have documented my findings without the analytical skills or insight of a Randal Carlson, so I cannot provide interpretations or explanations. So don't ask!

Last Thursday afternoon marked the beginning of our gathering at the familiar corners of the KitKat Gentleman's Lounge and Laundromat, where we eagerly awaited the much-anticipated "Happy Hour."

As we settled in, we casually observed the bartender's legendary Admiral TV, which he proudly asserts is the last model ever produced in the United States.

Remarkably, this vintage piece of technology withstood the chaos of "Earth Fell Flat" day, leaving us both amused and intrigued.

I inquired about his reasoning for believing that the ancient television had survived the devastating EMP blast that obliterated most modern technology, courtesy of the rogue Llyod Austin Bio-Gender Brigade, a faction of the rebellious Antifa Militia engaged in a fierce struggle against Ahriman's off-world mercenaries in the “Battle for the Upper Mississippi River Basin.”

He simply shrugged and remarked, "They made them better back in those ancient days."

Without missing a beat, he shifted the topic to express his growing anxiety over my overdue bar tab, clearly skeptical of my heartfelt assurance that I would settle my debt as soon as my advance check from WWWG arrived at the recently reestablished Western Union.

The biggest challenge of waiting for the first round of "Happy Hour" drink specials is the risk of getting sucked into conversations filled with conspiracy theories, often shared by fellow patrons who rely on these specials for their daily dose of alcohol.

To cope, the most sensible approach is to zone out, pretending to be engrossed in the flickering screen of the last bastion of true American technology.

This is the very device that the guru Ahriman has tried to convince us to despise, labeling it the source of our social anxieties and miseries, all while I suspect he secretly hoards a few of these vintage Admiral TVs for himself.

In an unexpected turn of events, state media outlet CNNister was not airing its usual cacophony of loud commentators, who often dominated discussions to push their mundane political narratives about supposed dark dealings within the New Tulsa Government. Instead, I found myself gazing at a group of astute, seasoned intellectuals—those remarkable individuals who, against all odds, had weathered the storms of the past decade marked by the disastrous Ahriman social revolution, known as "The Grand Social Reset."

Initially, I wondered if they were still alive, but that felt like a naive question as I saw them on CNNister.

It was surprising to realize that such brilliant minds had managed to endure the purges carried out by the Ahriman Youth Movement, which sought to eliminate the remnants of the so-called evil demon of technology.

This campaign, relentless in its approach, involved going door-to-door and community-to-community, supported by the nationalized Antifa Militia and orchestrated by Ahriman's anonymous cadre of clerks and social accountants, the WEF Goonies.

Randal Carlson and Professor Robert Schoch appeared live on CNNister, passionately discussing their groundbreaking research with the host.

They proposed that specific magnetic field frequencies could induce a state of awareness in plasma, suggesting it could form the fundamental building blocks of life.

Their findings indicated that when low-temperature plasma is energized by a high-voltage spark, it can create simple life structures capable of cell division and replication.

They further argued that Plasmoids, which are found in the upper atmosphere's thermosphere, exhibit signs of awareness, purposeful movement, and even a sense of community.

In the midst of the discussion, CNNister's commentator seemed bewildered, attempting to redirect the dialogue towards inquiries such as, "What prompts Randal to maintain such lengthy hair in a society where Ahriman's social standards frown upon this outdated style?" or even more provocatively, "Could his hairstyle be interpreted as a subtle act of defiance against the Great Social Reset?"

Out of nowhere, the elderly woman with blue hair, seated a couple of bar stools away, erupted into a hearty laugh that caught me off guard, pulling my attention away from the CNN broadcast.

With a knowing nod, she playfully remarked that this was the most ridiculous thing she had heard since her husband announced he was leaving her for a twenty-something waitress from the local diner.

It seemed she had taken an immediate dislike to Randal, perhaps because he bore a resemblance to her ex-husband.

She then mockingly amplified her voice, exclaiming, "Plasma energy has life? Next, they'll claim these Plasmoids deserve human rights and equal housing!"

Despite being well aware, as stated in the 36th edition of the Official Hobo International's Operations Manual, that a seasoned Hobo Traveler should steer clear of nonsensical discussions—particularly with inebriated elderly women—I foolishly tried to convey to her the significance of two of the brightest minds remaining in the wreckage of Ahriman's disbanded Coalition of Willing Nations, commonly known as the Western Nations.

I believed this topic held greater weight than her personal opinions on the situation.

This was undoubtedly a significant misstep on my part, culminating in a prolonged shouting match that made me understand why her husband might be drawn to a young waitress.

Such discussions often unfold at the renowned KitKat Gentleman's Lounge and Laundromat, where the bartender's voice pierced through the chaos, urging us to either quiet down or leave. Amidst the clamor, one side demanded*, "Can you prove it?"*

While many would regret breaching the fundamental rule of the International Hobo Code by engaging in futile bar disputes, I viewed her question as a genuine challenge. How could I ascertain whether she or the brightest minds in this fractured world held the truth?

The answer had been right in front of me the entire time, resting on my wrist.

My HFM (Harmonic Frequency Modulator) device held the key to the solution. Given that everything functions within a specific frequency range and is safeguarded by a magnetic frequency membrane, it dawned on me: why not simply adjust the device to match the plasma's frequency and take a closer look?

Navigating the vast array of frequencies may seem straightforward at first glance, but

OFF INTO THE AUTHENTIC REALM OF THE PLASMOIDS

GIOVANNI METRO STOP GALLERY

without a clear understanding of the frequency range, you could find yourself endlessly searching, akin to "spinning the dial."

The sheer number of frequencies is staggering, and pinpointing the right one without a solid starting point can feel like an impossible task—much like trying to win the lottery three times in a row while driving a VW Bug down the Autobahn, accompanied by a chorus of singing nuns reminiscent of a classic film featuring Whoopi Goldberg.

In essence, it presents a formidable challenge.

Navigating the complexities of plasma's harmonic magnetic frequency can be quite a challenge, especially since this information isn't readily accessible to those outside the scientific community, particularly at agencies like DARPA.

When attempting to reach out to various secretive NHH Research Labs for insights on plasma's frequency vibration variance, I often found myself met with the same frustrating response.

The person on the other end would politely ask me to hold, claiming my call was important, yet it was clear that all their scientists were preoccupied with other matters.

I couldn't help but wonder if they were actually contacting the National Security Council to trace my call instead.
I stumbled upon a clandestine chatroom filled with ambitious junior scientists eager to make their mark on the world, and within minutes of posting my inquiry, I received the right frequency along with a flood of responses offering assistance in constructing a doomsday plasma bomb.

PLASMA BOMBS?

It's worth noting that this chatroom was populated by a bizarre mix of wealthy trust fund kids, quirky aspiring geniuses, and a handful of venture capitalists all vying for a stake in whatever wild schemes these groups might concoct.
Tuning into the frequency on my semi-legal, consumer-grade HFM Device, I recalled the recent repair it underwent at a discreet back-alley shop I discovered on the dark web, praised for its stellar “Yelp” reviews and a clean slate with no known association with MI6, the FBI or, even the USPS.

Despite their efforts, they were unable to repair the sophisticated circuit found in the standard Multiverse model.
They argue that Earth lacks the necessary circuit components and advanced power units because these export versions were deliberately stripped of their superior tele-a-portal features as part of a licensing agreement between ACME Light Industries Corporation and the Multiverse's Corporate Congress Ministry of Trade.
Interestingly, it has come to my attention that Mister Billy D'Gated, along with the CEO of SkyNet Research Laboratories, holds a position on the corporate board of ACME.
For newcomers to our podcast, it's important to clarify that the export bootleg HFM Devices available on the dark web are designed for "Read" view-only access.
This means that while you can tune the device to the correct frequency and visually explore the harmonic barrier—referred to as a membrane—you cannot physically travel to those locations within the lower spheres of the Multiverse.
The absurdity of the time travel proposal from those DARPA enthusiasts is hard to overlook, especially considering their push for Congress to allocate yet another billion dollars in the New Tulsa Government script for a project that has repeatedly failed to yield results.

GIOVANNI METRO STOP GALLERY

This funding is intended to create a power source for the faulty HFM Device, an artifact I obtained from the renowned guru Wanda before leaving on her journey home to the 8th Sphere of the Multiverse.

I sold it to DARPO at an incredibly low price, and now, out of their lack of gratitude, I find myself entangled in numerous legal battles with them as they demand a refund for the billions they squandered, mistakenly believing it was a time machine.

It's quite the situation! It's baffling to think that they seek such a hefty investment for a consumer gadget that can be found in any Multiverse Mall for under 100 Gold Dinars.

To add to the farce, they still cling to the notion that it functions as a time machine.

If this represents the pinnacle of our intellectual capabilities, I genuinely worry about what lies ahead.

Experts in HFM technology have aptly compared the experience of using its striped version to that of remote viewers.

In this scenario, individuals find themselves visually immersed in a specific location, yet they remain unable to engage with the local population or pursue opportunities for employment or refugee status.
